

I fully agree with the comments made by the American Radio Relay League (ARRL) concerning the Broadcast over Power Line (BPL) proposal. The comments by it's (BPL) proponents are motivated by greed and not by concern for the long term benefits to the general public nor to the amateur radio public in particular. The power companies cause enough interference to Hams with their faulty equipment generating radio frequency interference accidentally. To let them do it purposely is the height of folly. If you drive the amateur radio community out of existence with this ill thought out proposal, who will help with homeland security when all else fails? Also, what happened to the FCC rules on non-interference? Surely this scheme must violate those rules!
